Q: jQuery value not being returned So I'm trying to learn how to use jQuery and thought it would be a cool idea to make a website with it. I've got an HTML document that is set up right now, but I have a bit of jQuery in it that I can't seem to be able to get working and I'm not sure why. Below is the jQuery in the HTML document: `$(document).ready(function(){ $('#login').click(function(){ // valA is the value of the input which is "user" var valA = $('#login').val(); var valB = $('#pw').val(); if (valA == user && valB == pass) { alert('You are logged in!'); } else if (valA!= user) { alert('Wrong username or password!'); } }); });` And here is the HTML that I have so far: Login Password So I'm wondering if it's something stupid I'm doing or if I have done something wrong. Any help would be greatly appreciated! A: The id attribute should be unique, so instead of Login make it Login So, if the id "login" already exists in the html, then the event will not be able to attach and the `if (valA == user && valB == pass) { alert('You are logged in!'); }` will not be able

As is well known in the art of integrated circuit chips, data bits are stored in, and read from, memory cells of the integrated circuit chips. Data bits are typically stored in memory cells as a "0" or a "1". When reading data bits from memory cells, both "0" and "1" bits will be sensed, however, it is necessary to distinguish the data bits and the "1" bits that are to be outputted as data bits. The on-chip voltage of integrated circuit chips are typically designed to operate in two regions, a first region of more than 1.5 V and a second region of less than 1.5 V. In the first region, which is referred to herein as the high logic region, internal nodes of the integrated circuit chips are typically driven to a voltage of greater than 1.5V, and digital logic is carried out. In the second region, which is referred to herein as the low logic region, internal nodes of the integrated circuit chips are typically driven to a voltage of less than 1.5V, and analog measurements of the integrated circuit chips are made. However, it is more difficult to determine the "1" bit values stored in the memory cells of memory arrays of integrated circuit chips operating in the low logic region, as compared to "1" bit values stored in the memory cells of memory arrays of integrated circuit chips operating in the high logic region. In particular, a time delay may be required to sense "1" bits stored in memory cells of memory arrays of integrated circuit chips operating in the low logic region. Thus, there is a need to overcome these and other deficiencies of the prior art.Q: How to split up a massive JSON string I'm using Nokogiri to grab JSON data from a third-party API that I do not have control over. I just have to use it. My problem is that the JSON string is HUGE (450kb). I don't need every field, just a few key/value pairs. I was wondering if anyone had any experience with any JSON parsing libraries or methods of slicing up the string and saving it as a separate file. A: The json gem is a pretty good way to go. `require 'json' a_huge_json = { :a => { :b => 'foo' }, :c => 'bar' } split_`
